Three H Previews Aster, a Collection Designed to Bring Life Into the Workplace

Toronto, ON — Previewed at NeoCon 2026, Aster is a collection of mobile workplace objects designed by Thom Fougere Studio for Three H. Inspired by the rugged landscapes of the Cabot Trail, the collection brings nature, texture and utility into the workplace through a family of thoughtfully designed pieces intended for everyday use.

People are sensory, social creatures who carry their need for comfort and nature with them wherever they go, including to work. Aster was designed with that in mind. The collection asks what an office might feel like if it were given the same care and warmth as the spaces where people feel most at ease.

Aster includes a Portable Landscape, a coat rack, a serving cart and an office butler. Each piece is reduced to exactly what it needs to be, light enough to move easily and useful enough to find its place in almost any setting. Together, they bring moments of life and function into parts of the workplace that are often overlooked.

At the centre of the collection is the Portable Landscape, a large planter with inconspicuous casters inspired by the Cabot Trail, where small islands of trees rise from rocky peninsulas along the coastline. Designed to bring biophilia into the areas that need it most, Aster introduces nature into windowless meeting rooms, underutilized corners and transitional spaces. The planter is intentionally understated, allowing the plants themselves to take centre stage.

The remaining pieces share the same quiet approach. The coat rack, serving cart and office butler are designed to support the rhythms of everyday work. A surface can be pulled closer. A cart can move into a meeting. A coat can be placed somewhere that feels personal. These are objects designed to be touched, moved and genuinely used.

Named after the Aster flower, a plant known for thriving in overlooked conditions, the collection reflects an interest in the spaces that often receive the least attention. Rather than defining a room, Aster contributes to it, bringing character, utility and a sense of care to the workplace.

Crafted from sandblasted aluminum, the collection combines durability with a tactile quality that invites interaction. The material develops a natural patina through handling and use, creating a surface that changes over time. Clean forms and restrained detailing allow the pieces to sit comfortably alongside a range of workplace interiors while maintaining a distinct identity of their own.

Previewed at NeoCon 2026 and winner of the Interior Design HiP award in the accessories category, Aster reflects Three H's ongoing commitment to creating thoughtful workplace solutions rooted in human experience and inspired by the natural landscapes that surround its Northern Ontario home.
